I have always believed that tears are deeply personal and should not be shared with just anyone. Honestly, I am quite stubborn about revealing my tears to others. Although I can be sensitive and often cry during sentimental movies, I have never shed tears in front of others about my emotions or personal issues. The only times I've cried are when receiving injections😅. I've previously written about the role tears play in my life, particularly regarding the important people and the pain I've witnessed, which has been overwhelming. Yet, tears hold a unique power to strengthen bonds between people.

While expressing feelings can lead to tears, societal norms often teach men to suppress their emotions. However, I've seen a man cry, which deepened the intimacy between us. I've never witnessed a man cry in front of me before, not even my father, whose tears I only learned about from my mother. As an adult, I have only seen Pradee express his feelings through tears. Although it pains me to see him cry, I take pride in knowing that someone cares for me enough to show their vulnerability.

I understand that this might be a common occurrence in relationships, and Pradee may cry in front of his family or friends. But when it comes to me, I realize that he is the only man who has never hesitated to show his tears. This experience feels new and signifies "the intimacy of love💞." When he fills with tears and hugs me tightly, I am surprised by how relaxed I feel. When he confides in me about crying for his sister or when he is burdened by issues and seeks me out as his source of comfort, it makes me feel valued. Now, I am filled with happy tears. Thank you so much, Paiyaaaa, for showing me your tears and allowing me to express my own. I love you…♥💞♥
